Proof against Pain.

One of the most marvelous stories in the entire range of medical literature has just come to light in the case of Mrs. Ellen Molloy against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for $50,- 000 damages, which she claims by reason of the negligent killing of her husband two years ago in a railroad wreck wherein a train of cars ran over her thighs and almost severed both legs midway above the knees and the hip joint.

Testimony from medical men and nurses will establish a fact which contradicts nearly all the experiences of mankind. John W. Molloy's sudden taking off by being run over by a heavy freight train, which jumped the track and struck him at a distance of thirty feet from the rails, was painless, though he lived for five hours after the train crushed and mangled him.

It is a story of death without pain, under circumstances unknown in previous cases of a similar character, of mutilation without feeling, of the amputation of both legs without shock or pain—in short, a story of fatal injury and death without suffering or loss of consciousness until just the moment before life was extinguished. Medical men say such a case probably never occurred before in the history of the world.

The petit-jury in the case recites that John W. Molloy was on his way to the Columbia Sugar Refinery, where he was a cooper, on Aug. 13, 1891, and that when he was at the side of the railroad track, between the bridge and the Potomac, a heavy freight train left the track and ran over his legs above the knees, and that they were a few hours thereafter amputated by Dr. R. E. Williams at the Receiving Hospital.

The doctor who amputated Molloy's legs said to an Examiner reporter recently: "Molloy did not suffer from the terrible accident which resulted in his death. He told me he felt no pain from being struck and run over by the train, and that he did not suffer thereafter from the effects of the frightful shock.
When I saw him he was not in any apparent misery, though his crushed legs were hanging in a mangled condition and the blood was fast ebbing from his veins. His friends asked whether he was so badly hurt that his legs would be lost, and he answered them with the serenity of a man smoking a cigar in a rocking chair. He said that a few strokes of the knife would settle the leg question with him forever."

"I then proposed to amputate his legs," said Dr. Williams, "and he watched me put the instruments in the antiseptic bath. He said he supposed if he didn't feel a train of cars he wouldn't feel a little thing like a knife, and on making an examination I discovered that he was still wholly insensible to pain. There was, therefore, no occasion to give him chloroform, and I amputated his legs while he watched me. He knew something was pressing against his legs, but he didn't feel it, but there was no pain."

"In some manner the injury paralyzed the sensory nerves and left the nerves of motion intact, for he could talk all right and move himself readily. Such a case of frozen nerves might not occur again in ages."— San Francisco Examiner.

WITH BEAUREGARD'S SWORD.—At a meeting of the Charleston, S. C., City Council Wednesday night the city was presented with the parade flag of the First South Carolina Regular Artillery.
The flag was lost at the evacuation of Charleston in 1865 and was recovered by a collector of Confederate relics, who paid $100 for it. It was discovered by Captain Charles Inglesby, who first suggested that it be purchased and presented to the city. The amount of the purchase money was contributed by Mrs. David Roberts, a daughter of Colonel Beauregard, the first commander of the regiment.

The flag and the presentation to the City flag and the presentation to the City Council took place Wednesday night.
The flag will be kept with the Beauregard's sword. It floated over the city during the fight of April 7, 1865, and was saved even the fort and a fleet of iron.
